

A dolphin surfaces, clears its blowhole, then re-submerges. The paddlers peer into the night, trying to bring the sleek sea creature into focus, but the gurgling sound of its exhalation proves the only sign of its passage.

The paddlers wonder where the other two are, out there in Three Dolphin Creek.

Where the creek splits, each branch winding a corkscrew path through the marsh, the paddlers turn and point their bows toward home. A slight wind at their backs and they're nearly coasting, a stroke here and there to keep their course true.

The lights on the shore come into sharper focus, and soon they arrive back at the dock.

"You did a good job leading us," Bumgartner tells Howland. Howland whimsically smiles, and you know what he must be thinking.

"I get paid for this? I must be doing something right."

Or maybe, with Holly Golightly, he's singing a familiar song in his head:

*We're after the same rainbow's end –
waiting 'round the bend,
my huckleberry friend,
Moon River and me.*
