public,” Doering says. “That’s part of my philosophy. The better people know you, the more comfortable they are in calling you when they need help. Randall’s not one who’s shy with words, so he’s pretty good at this.”

John Gibson, owner of Redfern Jewelers, agrees. Gibson made a career in law enforcement, spending 35 years with the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

“His intense interest in the community and the people around him is what makes him a good police officer,” Gibson says. “He’s got his ear to the ground and he really knows what’s going on. He talks to people and they’re very much at ease with him.

“He comes into our shop every once in a while and we just talk. There’s a special rapport between those in law enforcement. He’s one of the better police officers we have around here.”

Lacey has befriended senior citizens, shop owners, tourists, residents, but there’s also an unlikely group he champions: skateboarders.

They are much maligned on the island and considered by many to be a criminal element, but Lacey is quick to come to their defense.

“I deal with skateboarders all the time,” Lacey says. “They know I’m their best friend. I used to be a skateboarder when I was young. They’re the most discriminated against group on the island.”

The problem is there’s no place for them to skate – legally, that is – so they play a cat-and-mouse game with the police, picking a spot and skating until they’re told to move on.

“They go wherever they can go until somebody chases them off,” Lacey says. “It’s unbelievable how many calls we get about skateboarders, but I look out for them as much as I can.”

The county has plans to build a park for skateboarders, and Lacey will be glad to see those plans materialize.
